

Elevated ideas.

Molly Ward, owner of Mountain Goat Instructional Design, LLC (MGID), is a Science Education Consultant with more than 15 years of experience creating customized teaching and learning solutions for science education. Molly's educational background includes an M.S. in Science Education and a B.S. in Geology.

Molly has worked as an Education Specialist and Project Manager for non-profit organizations such as the Project WET (Water Education for Teachers)

Foundation, the Museum of the Rockies and Montana Outdoor Science School, as well as for Yellowstone National Park. Clients of MGID include successful education outreach non-profits, agencies, foundations and companies.

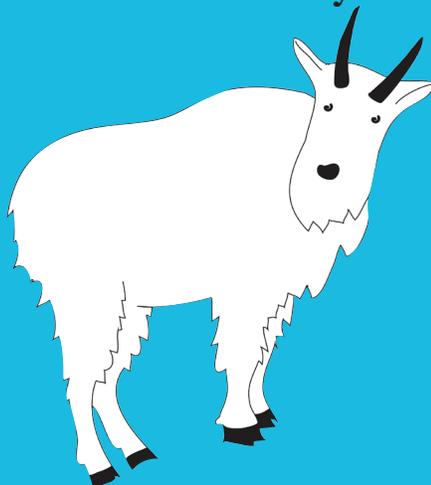

As an Informal Science Educator, Molly is skilled in curriculum development. Projects include classroom and outdoor activities, courses and events for students and educators, children's activity books (including Project WET's award-winning Discover the Yellowstone River KIDS Activity Booklet), digital resources and Next Generation Science Standard alignment. Her experience in thoughtful incorporation of educational technologies includes online interactive and downloadable content (e.g. DiscoverWater.org), online courses, screencasts, television, video and virtual field trips. Six years of museum experience has honed Molly's ability to create engaging content, displays and programming for kids, adults and the general public. Molly also designs and leads science courses for children and professional development trainings for educators incorporating both traditional and high-tech teaching and learning tools. Molly's confidence and wide range of skills allows MGID to provide a one-stop shop for creating educational packages—from inception to print.

Molly lives and works locally in Montana, as well as nationally and internationally (projects have taken her to Mongolia and Africa so far). She finds balance by pursuing outdoor activities and recreational travel.
